(U) Chinese Leadership After the 13th Party Congress

Intelligence Research Report

No. 139 December 17, 1987

Key Judgments

(U) In November 1987, the 13th National Congress of the Chinese Communist Party elected a new group of leaders who likely will guide the People's Republic of China into the next decade—and into the post—Deng era. The personnel changes at the congress extended the process of leadership rejuvenation that has been under way since the late 1970s in the Central Committee, the Politburo, and the party's other top organs.

(LOU) Almost all of China's highest decisionmaking positions are now filled by younger reformers and middle-of-the-road technocrats. The average age of the Politburo dropped by more than seven years as a result of the party congress, and the percentage of Politburo members with at least some college-level education increased from slightly more than half to almost three-fourths. Because rejuvenation had been largely accomplished within the Central Committee by 1985, the average age of Central Committee members dropped only marginally, to 55. Almost three-fourths of the members and alternates have a college-level educational background.

(LOU) The new members of China's Politburo have a broad range of experience in China's highest priority sectors: energy, transportation, urban planning, finance, agriculture, and high technology. Thirteen of the 18 Politburo members and alternates have extensive experience as top-level administrators in province-level units or central bureaucracies; seven have served in key slots at both levels. For the first time since before the death of Mao Zedong in 1976, four provinces have representatives on the Politburo. Moreover, for the first time in CCP history, the Politburo and the Secretariat contain no specialist in Marxist-Leninist dogma.

(LOS) The number of members of the military on the Politburo is at a record low: only one career officer, along with the civilian Military Commission permanent vice chairman. Military representation within the Central Committee, however, increased slightly in percentage terms—from 16 percent to 18 percent—as a result of the reduction in the absolute size of the Central Committee. Military membership clearly reflects Deng Xiaoping's success in promoting a generation of younger professional officers.

(LOW) Provincial officials accounted for almost 40 percent of the total membership of the Central Committee, about the same proportion as in the outgoing Central Committee. All 29 provincial-level party secretaries and 26 of 29 governors were elected members. In addition, representatives from 12 of the cities most involved in economic reforms were elected either full or alternate members.

(LOU) The proportion of Central Committee seats taken by central government officials (31 percent) increased slightly over the last Committee. Almost all top government officials not obviously slated for retirement were elected to full or alternate membership, including all five Vice Premiers and the heads of 32 ministry-level agencies.

(LOW) The vast majority of Central Committee positions can be considered "safe" seats; incumbents in a large number of top party, government, and military posts can expect almost automatic election. Expected retirements, overlap between holders of multiple positions, and the election of some of the more junior incumbents to alternate status resulted in the election of some 25-30 lower ranking officials or "token" representatives of educational, scientific, minority, or other special interest groups.

The Politburo

- (U) Age. Members of the new Politburo are, on average, much younger than their immediate predecessors (see Table 1, appended). Among the 17 members and one alternate on the new Politburo, six are under 60 years of age, four are between 60 and 65, and only six are older than 70. Of the 24 full members and three alternates elected to the Politburo in 1982, only one was younger than 60, 15 were 70 or older, and four were older than 80. The average age of Politburo members and alternates dropped from 70.6 before the congress to 63.3 afterward, a decrease of 7.3 years, according to official Chinese statistics. The nine outgoing Politburo members averaged 78.7 years of age; the seven new members average 59.
- better educated than their predecessors. At least 13 of the 18 new members and alternates (72 percent) have some college-level education, although the experience of some was limited to makeshift "universities" at the party's war-time headquarters in Yanan or advanced political training in the Soviet Union before 1949. At least eight can claim fairly extensive regular post-secondary education. Among the members of the 1982 Politburo, only 13 of 27 (48 percent) seem to have had some college-level training and, of them, only a few had a regular college education. Of the 22 members and alternates of the outgoing Politburo, elected in 1985, 13 (55 percent) had some college background.
- (U) Background. The membership of the new Politburo clearly reflects China's future needs and priorities. Of the 18 members, 13 have experience as central and/or provincial economic administrators. Seven have served in key slots at both central and provincial levels. Experience in China's highest priority sectors—e.g., energy, transportation, agriculture, high technology—is also widespread within the new Politburo: Two members have served as Minister of Electronics, two have long backgrounds in the electric power industry, two in urban planning and construction, one in transportation, and two in finance. Moreover, Vice Premiers Wan Li and Li Peng have experience supervising transportation; and Wan, Vice Premier Tian Jiyun, and Sichuan party chief Yang Rudai all have extensive experience in agriculture.

^{1/} The attached tables include changes in the membership of the Central Advisory Commission and the Central Discipline Inspection Commission. Discussion of these changes, however, is not included.

- Four of the seven new members of the Politburo-and one new member of the streamlined Secretariat -- recently have led reform efforts in key provinces. The inclusion of provincial officials in the Politburo for the first time since Deng's return to power is both a resumption of the practice followed during the 1950s and an apparent effort better to represent China's increasingly diverse constituencies. remains to be seen, however, whether most or all of the new "provincial" members of the Politburo eventually will be transferred to Beijing. Shanghai party secretary and Mayor Jiang Zeming, for example, is rumored to be in line to head a new super-ministerial commission in charge of electronics and other high-technology industries. Tianjin secretary and Mayor Li Ruihuan has been widely rumored as a candidate for Vice Premier, although his recent statements suggest he expects to remain in Tianjin.
- (U) China's big east coast cities—where heavy industry-based economies have been stagnating for the past several years—gained several seats on the new Politburo. Shanghai's two top leaders—Jiang Zemin and recently relieved party secretary Rui Xingwen, who joined the Secretariat—were elected to top party positions, as was Li Ruihuan of Tianjin and Beijing's party secretary, Li Ximing. In addition, Politburo Standing Committee member Hu Qili, now in charge of propaganda and day—to-day party work, is a former mayor of Tianjin, and Wan Li served most of the 1950s and 1960s as vice mayor of Beijing.
- (U) Interior provinces also have powerful representation in the new leadership, although in most cases by leaders at least once removed from their provincial experience. Yang Rudai, party chief in Sichuan, is the only new Politburo member currently holding a position in an interior province. But Song Ping spent almost a decade in the top party post in Gansu; Wan Li pioneered agricultural reforms as governor and first secretary in Anhui during the late 1970s; Tian Jiyun had long experience in Guizhou and Sichuan; and General Secretary Zhao Ziyang made his career as a provincial administrator in Guangdong and Sichuan. Former General Secretary Hu Yaobang, closely associated with the interests of the less-developed interior, also served briefly as Shaanxi party chief before the Cultural Revolution.
- (¢) Planners. At least three members of the new Politburo can be termed "economic conservatives." Acting Premier Li Peng and Vice Premier Yao Yilin-both of whom joined the Politburo's Standing Committee—and former State Planning Commission Chairman Song Ping are thought to favor a slower pace and narrower scope for reform and seem to envision a continued strong role for central planning. All three have strong ties to party elder Chen Yun, the dean of Chinese economic conservatism, and espouse his doctrine of maintaining the "four balances" between aggregate social supply and demand, revenue and expenditure, bank loans and repayments, and foreign exchange income and spending.

(LOU) Ideologues. Perhaps the most notable difference between the new Politburo and the outgoing one is the absence of a specialist in Marxist-Leninist dogma in the current leadership. Party ideologue Hu Qiaomu retired from the Politburo; his Secretariat counterpart Deng Liqun failed to win reelection to the Central Committee. The relatively liberal Hu Qili will oversee the propaganda, ideology, and culture sectors.

(U) Military. The military's representation on the Politburo has fallen to an all-time low. The only remaining professional officer is Gen. Qin Jiwei, commander of the Beijing Military Region. Yang Shangkun, the only octogenarian reelected to the Central Committee, was held over as a member of the Politburo and permanent vice chairman of the Military Commission.

Politburo is a reflection of both the current emphasis on civilian economic priority and the success of Deng's decadelong campaign to return the Peoples Liberation Army to the barracks, reinforce the principle of civilian control, and make the PLA a more professional, less "political" institution. The military's role in political decisionmaking will remain limited. But the promotion of younger professional officers to top command and staff positions and the limited military background of the new civilian members of the Politburo likely will give military leaders considerable influence on issues of direct interest to the PLA.

The Standing Committee

(U) Only Zhao Ziyang remains from the previous Politburo Standing Committee. Deng Xiaoping, Chen Yun, and President Li Xiannian have retired, and Hu Yaobang--ousted as General Secretary in January 1987--was demoted to regular membership. The average age of the five members of the new Standing Committee is 63.6, down from an average of 76.6 for their predecessors.

(S) The political balance on the new five-man Standing Committee is closer than on the full Politburo, with Zhao and

Hu Qili believed to be the strongest supporters of fundamental, systemic reform, Li Peng and Yao Yilin more cautious, and Qiao Shi--in charge of security affairs--the swing vote. Qiao has a reputation as cautious, judicious, and fair, favorable to reform but sensitive to the hazards inherent in its implementation.

(U) The role of the Standing Committee has also been redefined. According to changes in the party constitution introduced at the congress, the Standing Committee will report more often to the full Politburo which, in turn, will become the principal locus of policymaking.

(LOU) Moreover, the individual responsibilities of the members of the Standing Committee have been more explicitly defined than previously. Zhao will "grasp overall work," reportedly including overseeing Li Peng's performance as Premier and keeping a strong hand in the formulation and implementation of economic reform policy. Li Peng, as acting Premier, will handle State Council affairs. Qiao Shi is in charge of "political and legal" matters—a euphemism for security—related work. Hu Qili is in charge of propaganda and intraparty business, and Yao Yilin will oversee the economy.

(boll) The Secretariat

In effect, the Standing Committee has taken over from the Secretariat as the place where party and government affairs are coordinated and where macro-policy is honed before being turned over to specific bureaucracies for implementation. The size of the Secretariat has been dramatically reduced; it is now composed of four full members and one alternate—compared with 10 members before the congress. It will handle only the party's internal affairs, including personnel matters. Hu Yaobang was accused of using the Secretariat as a personal power base, usurping power by shifting decisionmaking authority from other organs into his bailiwick.

The Central Committee

(U) In an effort to streamline the Central Committee and make it a more meaningful decisionmaking body, the 13th party congress reduced its size from 210 members and 138 alternates to 175 full members and 110 alternates (see Table 2), and announced plans for it to meet more often than its current yearly schedule. Only about half (54 percent) of the members of the 12th Central Committee were reelected, but those 114 constitute 65 percent of the new, smaller body. In addition, 22 persons—16 percent of the old alternates—were promoted to full membership, and 39 new members (22 percent of the total) were added. (See Table 3.)

CONFIDENT UNGLASSIFIED

(U) Fewer new members were added to the 13th Central Committee than to the 12th, elected in 1982, but about half of the holdovers from the 12th were added by the 1985 special representative conference. In all, only about one-third of the members elected in 1982 remain on the Central Committee.

(LOU) The procedures by which nominees are chosen for the Central Committee remain a mystery. According to a number of accounts, Zhao Ziyang, party elder Bo Yibo, and several other leaders were in charge of compiling a name list for examination by the top leadership at this summer's meetings at Beidaihe. Song Ping's Central Committee General Office, the repository of personnel dossiers for high-ranking party members, likely also was involved.

(LOU) Whatever the exact procedure, there appears to be a large number of relatively "safe" seats, official positions in the party, government, and military which are almost automatically assured a place in the Central Committee or, at the least, an alternate membership. Naturally, all candidates for the Politburo and the Secretariat are assured a Central Committee seat. At this congress, they total 21 persons. All 29 provincial party secretaries are certain to be elected—at this congress, three provincial secretaries were also elected to the Politburo—as are almost all provincial governors. Heads of such key central party offices as the general office, international liaison department, united front work department, and propaganda department all are almost automatically included in the Central Committee.

(L&U) Unless slated for retirement in the near future, incumbent Vice Premiers, State Councilors, State Commission chairmen, or Ministers presumably also are elected Central Committee members. The total number of such positions exceeds 50. In addition, top state officials and officers of the National People's Congress who are not on the retirement list can expect election to the Central Committee. Perhaps five or six such positions are involved. In the PLA, the head and principal deputy from the General Staff and from the Political and Logistics Departments; the commander and political commissar of the Air Force, Navy, and Second Artillery (strategic rocket forces); and the commanders and political commissars of the seven military regions and three Navy fleets all normally would receive seats on the Central Committee.

(LOU) Added together, these "safe" seats constitute the vast majority--if not the total--of the 175 Central Committee seats actually awarded. Expected retirements, some overlap between holders of offices, and the inclusion of some of the more junior occupants of these key positions as alternate members, however, result in a "surplus" of perhaps 25-30 seats which can be allocated to worthy lower ranking functionaries, officials slated for promotion to replace designated retirees, or "tokens" from cultural, academic, scientific, minority, municipal, or other special interest groups.

- (U) Age. Because Deng's efforts to rejuvenate the Central Committee had achieved significant progress at the 12th party congress in 1982 and at the special conference of party representatives in 1985, average ages in the new Central Committee are not much lower than they were then, and members of the 13th congress will, on average, actually be slightly older than their predecessors when the 14th Central Committee is elected in 1992. The results of the new Central Committee election can be said to represent more a "deossification" of the leadership than a rejuvenation.
- (U) According to official Chinese statistics, the average age of the 285 members and alternates is 55.2, down 3.9 years from the average age of those elected in 1982. Those under the age of 55 account for 132 members and alternates, or 46.3 percent of the total, a 19.5-percent increase over the previous Central Committee. Those 61 or older number 57, accounting for one-fifth of the total, reportedly a 29.1-percent decrease from the outgoing Central Committee.
- (U) Full members of the Central Committee average about 58, a marginal reduction from the average age of 59.6 for their predecessors. An examination of the average ages of retirees, retainees, and newly promoted members, however, suggests a more significant generational shift. The 95 members who stepped down averaged 67.9 years of age, while the 114 retained members average 60.4. Newly added members, however, average 55.9. Only one octogenarian remains in the Central Committee (Yang Shangkun), and only nine members are between 70 and 79 years of age (see Table 4).

(LOU) Education. Almost three-fourths of the members and alternates of the new Central Committee (209 of 285) have a college-level educational background, according to official statistics, representing an increase of 17.9 percent over the previous Central Committee. Fifty-seven of these are said to have advanced professional titles or degrees. Available data for full members suggests that at least 100, or almost 60 percent, have attended college and that about 25 (roughly 15 percent) almost certainly did not. Another 15-20 (or about 10 percent) likely received some post-secondary schooling. The educational backgrounds of the remainder are unknown. Overall, full members appear to be slightly older and slightly less likely to have attended college than alternates.

- (U) Composition. Representation of various sectors did not change significantly from the 12th to the 13th Central Committee, despite the reduction in the number of seats (see Table 5). Central party cadres retained about 10 percent of the full Central Committee membership; central government employees continue to hold just less than one-third of the seats; and provincial officials kept almost 40 percent of the slots. Military officers increased their percentage of full Central Committee memberships slightly over their 1985 allotment--from 16 percent to 17 percent--but hold notably less than the 22 percent of full memberships they occupied in 1982.
- (U) Provincial representation. Officials at or below the provincial level hold 114 of the 285 full and alternate memberships in the 13th Central Committee, or 40 percent of the total (see Table 6). All 29 provincial party secretaries—plus the party secretary of Hainan, expected to become a province in early 1988—were elected to full membership. Three governors—Wei Chunshu of Guangxi, Xie Feng of Hebei, and Song Ruixiang of Qinghai—were not elected as either full or alternate members. Two governors—Jia Zhijie of Gansu and He Zhiqiang of Yunnan—achieved only alternate status. The other 24 governors, including the mayors of the three provincial—level cities, were elected to full membership.
- (U) Of the 116 members and alternates elected from the provincial level or below, 70 are primarily party cadres and 41 primarily government officials. Three hold both the top party and government position in their province. Twenty of the 116 are prefectural or municipal officials. Within this group are key officials from important centers for economic experimentation and testing of new reforms, including the party secretaries of Harbin, Shenyang, Xuzhou, and Changzhou, the mayor of Guangzhou, and a vice mayor of Chongqing.
- (LOU) Government representation. Almost all top government officials not obviously slated for retirement within the next year became either full or alternate members in the Central Committee. President Li Xiannian—who stepped down from the Central Committee as well as the Politburo and its Standing Committee—and Vice President Ulanhu—who retired from the Central Committee and Politburo in 1985—are both expected to be replaced at the March 1988 first session of the 7th National People's Congress. State Councilors Fang Yi, Gu Mu, Ji Pengfei, Kang Shien, Zhang Aiping, and Zhang Jingfu—all slated for retirement—were not elected to the Central Committee.
- (U) Elected to full membership were the 32 of 44 ministry-level agency chiefs, including Li Tieying, who concurrently holds two ministry-level positions. Four ministers were elected to alternate status: the Ministers of Commerce, Liu Yi; Forestry, Gao Dezhan; Light Industry, Zeng Xianlin; and Public Health, Chen Minzhang. Eight minister-level government officials--most near or past retirement age--were not elected to either full or alternate membership. They are: Chairman of the State Economic Commission Lu Dong; Chairman of the State Family Planning Commission Wang Wei; and Ministers of Aeronautics, Mo Wenxiang; Space, Li Xu'e; Justice, Zou Yu; National Defense, Zhang Aiping; Public Security, Wang Fang; and Urban and Rural Construction and Environmental Protection, Ye Rutang.

- (EQU) Military representation. Fifty-two military officers were elected either full (29) or alternate (23) members of the new Central Committee. Of them, 19 are central-level cadres and 32 are officers at or below the regional, district, or group army level. The exact position of one is unknown. Three-fourths (39 of 52) of the military cadres on the Central Committee hold line or staff positions, while only 12 are political commissars or lower level political officers. Nineteen of 29 full members (66 percent) are commanders or staff officers, and only 10 (34 percent) are political cadres. The proportion of commanders and staff is far higher among alternates: 20 of 22 (91 percent) of those for whom positions are known.
- Five of the seven military region commanders were elected full members. The other two--You Taizhong of the Guangzhou Region and Xiang Shouzhi of the Nanjing Region-- apparently are slated to retire soon. Younger commanders obviously are being groomed. Fully one-third of the group army commanders won either full membership (2) or alternate status (6) in the new Central Committee.
- (U) Other. Educational, scientific, and technical specialists received the majority of the 17 seats not otherwise classified. Women hold 10 of the 175 full memberships in the Central Committee--at 5.7 percent, the same proportion as in the previous committee--but no longer are represented in either the Politburo or the Secretariat. This is the first time since 1969 that no woman has held a Politburo seat. Ethnic minorities account for 16 of 175 full memberships (9.1 percent), a marginal increase in absolute numbers over the 14 minority representatives in the 12th Central Committee but a more significant increase over their 6.7-percent share of seats.
